The CEO of the Interactive Games and Entertainment Association (IGEA), Ron Curry, says '...Australia is a nation that loves to play, achieve, connect, and learn through video games,' and according to the Australia Plays 2023 report produced by IGEA and Bond University, more Australians play video games than those who watch footy! With findings like these, it's no wonder many young people aspire to careers in the gaming industry, which in 2022, contributed 4.21 billion dollars to the Australian economy.

So, what does it take to bring a game to life and into the hands of the Australians who play them? You might be surprised by the diversity of roles.

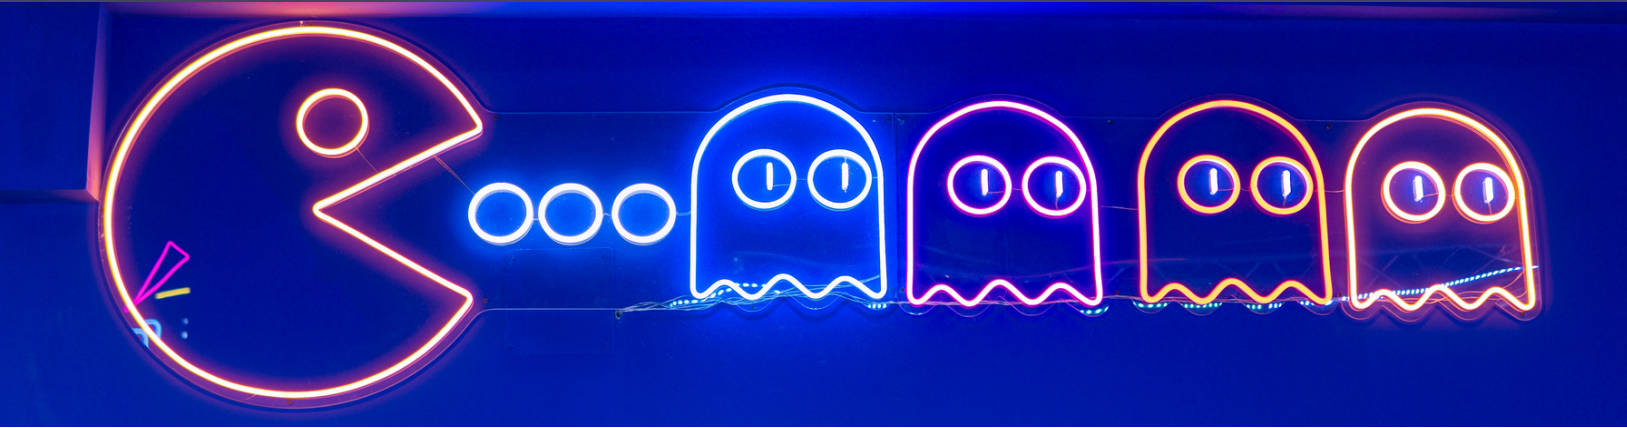

It takes a team of narrative copywriters, product managers, designers, animators, sound techs, programmers, developers, QA testers and more!

For success, you'll need skills and strengths like:

- Being a great team player (pun intended!)
- Imagination and creative thinking.
- Critical reasoning and problem solving ability.
- Good time management and an eye for detail.

If you love gaming, and crave a career that blends technology and creativity, there are VET and higher education pathways to the varied roles in the industry. Read on to learn more about the occupations and education pathways involved.

Gaming Occupations

Got a passion for gaming that you want to turn into a career? Check out these 6 roles!

You can learn more about these gaming careers on the Career Advice section of GamesHub.

Narrative Designer

Narrative Designers combine storytelling with game design to create the 'world' of the game and the 'personalities' and dialogue of the characters. They collaborate with the game director, artists, programmers, and other designers, and must have good skills writing, storytelling, and design documentation as well as strong communication, interpersonal and teamwork skills.

2D Artist and Illustrator

The role of a 2D artist is to turn ideas from a brief into images that will translate to a digital environment. It can also involve creating the promotional art for the game and some UI (user interface) work. Not only does a 2D artist need exceptional illustration skills, they also need to be great communicators who are flexible and adaptable in the workplace.

QA (Quality Assurance) Analyst

If you care about quality, have high standards, never miss a detail, like helping people solve problems, and you're an analytical thinker, a career in QA could be for you. A QA Analyst finds bugs, runs tests, and reports on the quality of a project.

Sound Designer

In games, audio effects need to be considered for every single interaction and it's Sound Designers who create them. Sound Designers need skills in writing music, editing voiceover, recording in the field, and mixing and cutting tracks.

Technical Audio Designer

While a Sound Designer creates audio like the theme song and character voices, the Technical Audio Designer puts them into the game. The Technical Designer's role involves taking sounds that have been created - for example, a footstep, and then changing them to fit the circumstances or environment, for example, editing the footstep to reflect the surface the character is walking on.

Marketing and Business Development

If the technical or production side of the industry isn't for you, a role in marketing or business development might be. These jobs are about knowing the brand/game's audience, creating relationships, and selling the product. You'll need to be business-minded, be a strategic thinker, and a people person to flourish in this area of the industry.
